

By Dick Evans

ORLANDO – Education is the key to life, it is what makes the world go round and the world improve.

Stephanie Legacy, a teacher from Eastport Elementary School in Annapolis, Md., got an education while attending BowlExpo.

“BowlExpo is wonderful, so educational and so much fun,” said Legacy, a name to die for when trying to make a name for yourself.

Stephanie Legacy made a name for herself this week by being named Bowling Educator of the Year by the Bowling Proprietors Association of America.

“I was very excited to win this great honor,” Legacy said.

Maybe equally important, her principal (Lynn Evans) also was excited that one of her teachers earned national recognition.

“She was excited for me and said I was very creative in the way I teach bowling.”

Two years ago the Anne Arundel County School Board approved the in-school physical education bowling program.

After getting taught the rudiments of the game on carpet lanes at school, the fifth graders get a free day at bowling centers like Severna Park Lanes, Annapolis Bowl and Greenway Bowl.

Stephanie, who earned her degree from Frostburg University, has three children ranging in age from one to six. She uses her six-year-old as a guinea pig for new bowling programs.

She is always learning and her pupils are always benefiting.
Ditto for the bowling industry.