Orlando, Fla.—Bowl Expo is a composite of the most interesting people in bowling. It brings together bowling center owners, bowling companies and the stars of the sport.

But one man, John Tinney from Panama City, Fla., represents the local bowling association, the men and women who belong to the United States Bowling Congress and enjoy the benefits of league and tournament play.

Tinney came to Bowl Expo because no bowling center owners in his area attended, and he felt it was important to learn what's happening around the country so he can utilize the information to make the Panama City association better for the bowlers.

"I just decided it was important to be here," Tinney said. "We must work together, so I'm going to bring the information back to our proprietors. I'm interested in promoting bowling, the sport in Panama City and there is just too much information here not to attend."

This is Tinney's second visit to Bowl Expo and he plans to continue to attend in the future. There are two centers and one military installation in his area and he's planning to share what he learned with them all. After all, it's good for the game, it's good for the centers and most important, it's good for the bowlers.

Because there is so much to learn, Tinney also stayed an extra day to attend the USBC workshop, another great opportunity to learn and help the bowlers.

International Bowl Expo is the showcase event of the Bowling Proprietors Association of America, which is located in Arlington, Texas.
